

I will describe how the effect of small scales on the structure formation on large scales can be parametrized by effective fluid parameters and a stochastic noise. In particular I will focus on how to constrain these terms. Using a simplified, but still realistic, model gives very strong constraints on the allowed parameters. I will also elaborate on the Bispectrum and point out its importance for testing effective field theory models for clustering.